Interpretation:

The route marked on the map is a trail in PEI where I live. It is called the confederation Trail. The reason why I marked this theme on the map is mainly because this trail is very distinctive. This is also an important project that you must go through after you come to PEI where I live.

The Confederation Trail was completed in August 2000, and it was designated Prince Edward Island's portion of the Trans Canada Trail; the first province to complete its section. Since then, Island communities have been working to add spur connections and to provide upgraded amenities to the trail. This Island-wide exploration corridor is ideal for visitors of all fitness levels. The main trail runs from Tignish(0km) to Elmira(274km). Branch trails extend into the heart of Charlottetown and many small towns and communities.

The Confederation Trail was developed on abandoned railway beds, and takes you across the Island, past wetlands and through hardwood groves, through quaint villages, and along sparkling rivers.

In the summer season, activity on the Confederation Trail is limited to walking, hiking, running, cycling, and is accessible to wheelchairs. In the snow months it is turned over exclusively to snowmobile use.
